Deer gets stuck between bars of a wrought iron fence

CAMAS, WASH. - A female deer ended up in quite a precarious position after somehow getting itself stuck between two bars of a wrought iron fence.

Police say the deer had apparently struggled for several hours to try to get itself out and there was a pile of fur on the ground that had rubbed off.

"The poor thing's legs were shaking, she was so tired and scared," said Camas Firefighter Kevin Wilson.

Rescue crews and police officers were unable to get the deer safely out of the fence, so they called animal control and Washington Department of Wildlife officials to help out.

The deer was tranquilized and then extricated without any apparent injuries.

It took more than an hour to free her and she has since been transported into the woods to be set free.
